GALBRAITH'S GROVE—VARTY LAKE.

This increasingly popular Picnic and Camping ground had a busy and happy season 1925.

Wilton's annual picnic was followed by the "Yarker Union Picnic," which was most successful, a large amount of money being raised for the redecorating of the parsonage. Newburgh S. S. Picnic was largely attended and the usual sports for the children, supplemented by a game of baseball between Napanee Juniors and Newburgh H. S.

"Trinity," Napanee, had a largely attended picnic and unusually interesting sports.

The cottagers were:

Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Carson, Kingston; Mrs. Card, Miss Card, Odessa; Mrs. Bray and children, Newburgh; Mr. and Mrs. Wagar, Miss Salisbury, Enterprise; Mr. and Mrs. Copp and son, Mr. Wilbur Armstrong, Toronto; The Misses Babcock, Hollefqrd; Miss Tummon, Plaineld; Miss Martin, Sydenham; Mrs. W. Renton and sons, Kingston; Mrs. Dr. Renton, Kingston; Rev. H. A. and Mrs. Bunt and family, Enterprise; Mrs. Winter and son, Claude, Selby; Mrs. Hudgin, Miss Hazel Winter, Newburgh; Rev. T. H. P. Anderson, Mrs. Anderson and family, Newburgh; The Misses Paul, Mrs. Shier and family, Newburgh; and the Pioneers, Mr. and Mrs. A. Connolly, Yarker, who so cheerily welcome all who come; and Rev. Enos Farnsworth and Mrs. Farnsworth, of Canifton, who have spent seventeen summers at this camp.

Other visitors who added greatly to the pleasure of Camp life were Mrs. Ewart and Miss Ewart, of Meota, Sask.; Miss Marion Freeman, Yarker; Dr. J. Renton and Miss Cuff, Trenton; Mr. and Mrs. Brenton, Miss Marie Brenton, Mrs. Pringle, Miss Callary, Canifton; Mr. Franklin Farnsworth, Toronto; Mr. Ralph Campney, Ottawa; Mr. Carroll Anderson, B.A., Toronto; Mr. L. G. Hudgin, Miss Beulah Hudgin, Miss Florence Abbott, Mr. Ralph Winter, Selby; Mr. and Mrs. T. I. Winter, Miss Hill, Miss Milligan, Newburgh; Mr. and Mrs. Mark Trampour, Kingston; Mrs. (Dr.) Oldham, Mrs. J. F. Connolly, Yarker; Mr. and Mrs. Huffman, Napanee; Mrs. Davidson, Sask.

Much sadness was felt and sympathy expressed when Mrs. Freeman Yarker, a dear and highly respected friend of many of the campers, passed away. Rev. Mr. Farnsworth officiated at the funeral services.

The cottages have all been freshly painted and furnished with new canvas curtains. Two new kitchens have been built and new floors put in the others. Much satisfaction was expressed with these improvements and in anticipation of more next year.

As usual in this camp the Sabbath was well kept, and the services of the ministers, who while holidaying, led in service of song and prayer and address, are appreciated.

Rev. E. Farnsworth was as usual the "Camp fisherman" having caught forty-eight (48) pike this season, although the honors for capturing the Big Fish, must go to Rev. R. H. Bunt, B.A.. This one weighed 5½ lbs. and measured 31 inches.

Special mention must be made of the "Camp res" this year, which with the weiners, stunts, songs and "ghost" were so enjoyable.

Rev. K. Sato, Japan, told us of Japanese stories and games. The last Camp Fire was made the occasion of a "shower" for Miss Farnsworth, of Canifton. Two tiny girls, Betty and Eileen, carried a big white basket packed with white parcels, which when unwrapped revealed many gifts with good wishes expressed in merry rhyme.

So the season's holiday drew to a close, but there lingers yet memories of "Just the songs at Twilight"; the dress parade, the demonstrations, the weird cry of the loon, the dip of the paddle, the early morning hour and the "snores" from every cottage, the indescribable beauty of the lake at sunset, and the thoughtful kindness of Mrs. R. Galbraith and Mr. Percy Galbraith.

Supplies were sent to the Vegreville and "Cecelia Jeffrey" School Homes, while four bales of quilts were sent to the new school just being opened at New Liskeard.

TEACHING DOGS TO SMUGGLE.

Customs Officers In Europe Have to Keep Their Eyes Open.

The lucrative smuggling trade which exists on the Swiss-Italian frontier necessitates constant vigilance by Italian customs officials. The smuggled goods include saccharine, tobacco, matches, and perfumes, which are heavily taxed in Italy.

The centre of the trade is on the frontier south of Lugano. Here the Italian authorities have constructed a high wire fence covered with small bells, which extends along many miles of the hills and valleys.

Customs officials are placed at frequent intervals along the wire "wall," which they watch night and day, but in spite of all precautions the illicit commerce continues to increase, as the smugglers, mostly Italians, and their trained dogs, are exceedingly clever.

During a dark night one of the smugglers will set the bells ringing purposely in his section, and when the officers rush to the spot other smugglers cut the wire a few hundred yards away and escape across the frontier with the contraband goods.

The training of dogs has become a fine, though cruel art. The smuggler lends his dog to the "trainer," who is always dressed in a customs officer's uniform. He beats the animal frequently, so that in a few weeks the dog will detest and fear a man in uniform, and avoid him anywhere in future. This is exactly the result desired by the owner.

The Italian smuggler then takes the dog with him across the frontier and teaches him to return home alone. The animal wears a coat provided with small pockets which contain the contraband goods, and becomes in time an accomplished smuggler. The dogs are shot on sight by the frontier guards, and this makes the animals even more wary and cunning.

The larger dogs carry their loads with great speed over the Alpine passes, and it becomes practically impossible to prevent this form of smuggling. A well-trained dog is worth a large sum of money, but he cannot be sold, for he will constantly return to his master's home, where, owing to his value, he has always been well treated.

The Italian authorities have found the system of bells unsatisfactory, and have recently placed them by small electric lamps on the wire fence, as most of the smuggling takes place at night.

It is doubtful, however, whether the new method will be a success, as it is a comparatively easy matter for the smugglers to cut off the electric current.

Most of the smugglers are known to the police and customs-house employes, but they cannot be arrested unless caught red-handed, which is a difficult affair.

World's Largest Carpet.

A carpet weighing twenty-one tons has been laid down in the foyer and restaurant of a leading London hotel. It covers a floor space of half an acre. Seventy men were required to handle it, and it is believed to be the largest in the world.

For the first time in the history of carpet-making, sixty-four Oriental rugs were woven together. Sixty-two came from Persia and two from China. The weaving was done by rug-workers from Samarkand.

According to their custom, the workers, before the growing carpet was allowed to encircle each one, wove a piece of colored rice fibre crescent-wise into the heart of it, to ensure that all who tread them shall know perpetual joy and felicity.

Australia's Child Brides.

Australian marriages during 1923 included 483 brides under seventeen years of age, the youngest being only thirteen, and seventy-three women of sixty-five years and over. The oldest bridegroom was eight-six.

Among the young mothers was a child of twelve, while six girls of only thirteen years gave birth to children.

Referring to infant mortality, Dr. J. W. Springthorpe, president of the Health Association for Women and Children in Victoria, stated that Australia had lost 122,473 children under the age of five years between 1918 and 1922.

House Built of Glass.

Plans for building houses of glass are being considered by American glass experts. Opaque glass can be produced in great quantities, it is claimed, at a reasonable cost.

"The glass house," says a writer in a trade journal, "has been the butt of many jokes, when not actually used as a target for brickbats. It has carried with it, too, the idea that everything within its walls was open to public inspection, and that the occupants must go to bed with their clothes on to avoid embarrassment.

"The material for the proposed glass house can be made in slabs one-eighth of an inch thick, thirty inches wide, and nine feet long. These slabs of opaque glass can be made in any shade or color the builder wants."

The writer says that glass houses must be constructed on a concrete foundation and a wood framework. There will be an air-pocket between the outside and the inside walls which will keep out both heat and cold. It is claimed that the first cost of the house would also prove to be practically the last, as the need for repairs would be almost non-existent.

Your Wonderful Eye.

Few people realize the extreme minuteness of the image received by the eye, according to Dr. Fraser Harris in the Optician and Scientific Instrument Maker.

The eye is a camera which had a double convex lens in front, a sensitive plate (the retina) behind, and is blackened inside, and, as in the plate of the photographer's camera, the image in the retina is upside down.

The entire surface of the retina is only about one square inch, a very small portion of it receiving the image of the outer world. This portion where the image is received is a specialized, slightly hollowed spot about one-twelfth of an inch in diameter—the macula lutea.

The photographic camera is adjusted for light by stops; the eye camera, by little muscles that dilate or contract the pupil.

A Judge.

As is well-known, Americans are fond of tacking official titles on their names.

"I once met a man in Chicago," said a prominent Englishman, "who called himself Judge Brown, and I ventured to ask him if he were a United States judge or a circuit court judge."

"Wall, I ain't neither," he answered, "I'm a judge of hosses."

In most people the hearing of the left ear is more acute than that of the right. This is the reason that most of us almost unconsciously use the left ear when telephoning.

Origin of Nautical Term "Knot."

The nautical "knot" was originally an actual knot on a ship's "log-line." This in turn took its name from the log of wood which was used by the old-time mariner in measuring distance. Presuming the sea to be without current, a log thrown into the water will remain stationary. Obviously, therefore, if it be thrown over from the bows of a ship, by the time the stern passes it, the ship must have travelled its own length in such-and-such a time. The log, then, was really the first way of determining a ship's speed. The next step was to attach a line to the log, the line being knotted at regular intervals of so many feet. The log, by this time of a fixed type, was thrown overboard and the line allowed to run free from a reel. At the end of so many seconds, the whole apparatus was hauled in and the knots that had been payed out counted. The ship was then said to be travelling at so many knots. The distance between the knots, as well as the number of seconds during which the log was overboard were regulated, so as to make it easy to work out how many nautical miles (which, by the way, are divisions of degrees of latitude and are rather longer than land miles), the ship was travelling an hour. And though to-day the modern log is a complicated clockwork apparatus, the old term is still used.

Invoking the Law.

There is one London bookstall, half in the street and half out of it, which is well equipped to meet thieving youngsters and others.

"Yes, sir," said the proprietor, "when my boy is away or asleep, I do lose a book or two occasionally. That's why the volumes on the front shelves are put loose—apart a little—so as I can keep my eyes about me—see out. When I catch a rascal in the act of 'pinching,' I drop this worthless old book onto him."

He proffered his missile. It was a bulky tattered boardless volume, lashed together with twine, and weighing several pounds. Its title—"Laws Against Petty Larceny."

His Pal!

The Bishop of Chelmsford likes to enliven his conversation with frequent anecdotes. One he told a friend of mine the other day is amusing. The bishop, it appears, was driving through a West Ham street, and had occasion to ask the way of a ragged little boy.

"I'll show you," the boy said, and jumped up on the footboard of the car. Arriving at the church he was seeking, the bishop was met by a police officer, who asked the boy what he was doing.

"Oh," retorted the urchin, jerking his thumb towards the bishop, "it's all right—e's a pal o' mine!"

Her Own Detective

A Girl Suspect Clears Herself

By ELINOR MARSH

We were a "bunch" of a dozen boys and girls, averaging in age perhaps seventeen years. We were young enough to get up parties on the principle of "Dutch treat" and not old enough for a boy to feel that if he asked one of the girls to go to an amusement he must hire a carriage for the purpose of taking her. We had informal dances in each other's houses and each boy was detailed, as they say in the army, to escort a particular girl to the dance. In this way all the girls were transported without doubling up.

All went well, and we were having a merry time when Roy Stivens, one of the boys who had gone sweet on a girl outside the set, insisted on introducing her among us. We girls were not pleased at the introduction of one we knew nothing about, but we yielded gracefully, and I consented to Roy bringing her to a dance that was to come off at my house.

It is marvelous how a nice, well bred boy will go daft on a girl entirely out of his sphere and in every way beneath him. The moment we girls saw Roy's friend, Sarah Stearns, we knew that a firebrand had been introduced among us. But it is easier to let a person into a social clique than to get him or her out. Roy was one of our nicest fellows, and we did not wish to offend him. Sarah Stearns was not invited again to any of our little dances, but Roy asked her to go with him on excursions, theater parties and the like. He was the only son of a widow who gave him all the money he wished and, among other luxuries, a splendid motor-car. He was accustomed to take us all out in the dances made by were holding our informal parties, and also took us on longer rides. Of course we could not object to his inviting Sarah to go on excursions in his car, and while she engaged we endeavored to treat her civilly.

Just before the spring opened Roy invited us all to go to his mother's country place for a week end. Of course Sarah Stearns would be of the party, Roy being at liberty to invite whom he pleased to his own home. Two-thirds of our "bunch" accepted, and Roy took us to our destination in his auto. The others would not go on account of Sarah Stearns being of the party.

I wished very much to enjoy the fun, but Eleanor Trevor was my particular girl chum, and she was one who intended to stay away. I persuaded her to go, however, since my pleasure depended on her doing so.

Roy's mother acted as chaperon and did all in her power to make our stay in her house enjoyable. One evening we were dancing when all of a sudden the electric lights ceased to glow, and we were left in total darkness. My friend Eleanor was dancing with Charlie Hunt at the time. Charlie, like Roy, was given everything he wanted, and among other things he possessed was a valuable gold watch. Soon after the lights were extinguished there was a tug at his watch chain and, feeling for it, he found it broken. His watch was gone. He was dancing with Eleanor when the darkness came, and of course they ceased to whirl and disengaged themselves. Five minutes later, when the lights continued to glow, they were still standing near each other.

Charlie, not wishing to mar our festivities, said nothing at the time about the loss of the watch, but the fact soon leaked out. An unpleasant feature of the matter was that he was dancing with Eleanor when the lights went out, and the logical inference was that she had relieved him of it. Nevertheless, none of us believed anything of the kind.

Our host was very much troubled. It was evident that there was a thief among us. So far as circumstantial evidence was concerned it pointed to Eleanor Trevor. She knew nothing about Charlie's loss or the position in which she stood until told her. She was not a person to cringe under such circumstances. With woman's intuition she at once spotted Sarah Stearns as being at the bottom of the trouble. She did not believe that Sarah had stolen the watch itself, but that she might inculpate Eleanor. Eleanor's theory was that Sarah had seen her dancing with Charlie when the lights had gone out and an opportunity had appeared to her of punishing the girl who she knew was in favor of ostracizing her from our set.

But Eleanor told no one except me of her suspicion, and I confess it seemed to me rather farfetched, though I did not say this to Eleanor.

"I've got a detective problem on my hands," said Eleanor to me, "and I'm especially interested in working it out. I wish you would give me the cold shoulder and ask the other girls to do the same."

"Why so?" I asked. "There's not one of us that believes for a moment that you are a thief."

"It will put Sarah Stearns off her guard and give me a better chance. If she took the watch—and I am sure she did—she must get rid of it. I'll take all possible pains to see that she doesn't send it away. I shall keep an eye on her all the while and note everything she does."

"I will aid you in that," I said.

The incident occurred on Saturday evening. All day Sunday either Eleanor or I kept watch on Sarah. Sunday afternoon she started with a letter in her hand for the postoffice. I told her that I had written a letter that I wished mailed. She offered to mail it for me. I went to my room for it, and when I came down had my hat and coat on and told her that I would go with her. To that she assented with at least apparent willingness. Whether or-no she was going to get rid of the watch, she had no chance to do so, for I did not let her out of my sight for a moment.

Eleanor interfered with her going out later in the evening to take the air on the porch. We all went to bed early, or at least to our rooms. We girls were roomed on the second floor, and each was given a room to herself. Eleanor was in my room till 11 o'clock. She said she expected to be up all night to see that Sarah Stearns did not get rid of the watch, and of course I would not commence till all in the house were supposed to be asleep.

"What are you going to do?" I asked.

"I'm going to stay in the hall."

"Go to bed," I urged. "None of us believes that you are a thief. Besides, you are acting on a theory. You will lose your sleep for nothing."

"I have more chance of success than you think," she said. "Charlie has been very nice to me and has told me certain things about the watch that it is well for me to know."

"Then he knows you are hunting for it?"

"No, what he told me was said casually. But he does not believe I robbed him. At least he says he doesn't."

"But I don't see how any mark on the watch can do you any good except to identify it when you have got it, and you will have to get it before you can identify it."

Eleanor made no reply to this. She simply kissed me good night and went to her room. I was a long while getting to sleep, but when I did I slept till 4 o'clock in the morning, when I was awakened by her. She told me that she had been awake all night and asked me to get up and continue the watch that she might get some sleep. I did as she asked, but it was evident that she had failed, and I believed she was on a wild goose chase.

She was up for an 8 o'clock breakfast and looked quite fresh, considering that she had gone to bed so late. During the day I helped her occasionally in her vigil and again prevented Sarah Stearns from going out alone. This time I could see that she suspected me, though she concealed the fact quite well.

"The party is to break up tomorrow," said Eleanor to me. "We were only invited till Tuesday morning. Either I must get that watch tonight or remain smirched for the rest of my life."

I assured her that she was not nor ever would be smirched by any one of us, to which she replied that Sarah Stearns would spread the matter abroad in a way that could not be countered.

Roy took us to drive during the afternoon. Eleanor feigned a headache and remained at home. She charged me to keep my eyes upon Sarah Stearns every moment. I suggested to Eleanor that she was remaining at home that she might search for the missing watch, but she said that would be useless, for if Sarah had left it she had undoubtedly hidden it in a safe place, but she believed Sarah had it with her, and Eleanor relied on me to see that she did not get rid of it during the ride. I did my work, but without results.

That night, as Eleanor and I went to our rooms, as we passed Sarah Stearns' room I saw Eleanor look up at the transom. Then she went with me into my room and took from my closet a bamboo stick with a book on one end and carried it away to her room. Just before 3 in the morning she came into my room and, holding the watch to my ear, asked me if I could hear it tick. I told her that I could hear it very distinctly. She removed it farther and farther from me, with each removal asking me if I could still hear it tick. When she had taken it some four or five yards from me I could still hear it.

"That will do," she said. "Your ear is far more keen than mine. It is now a few minutes before 3. Come with me."

She led me by the hand through the darkness to Sarah Stearns' door. There she took the bamboo stick with the hook on the end and, feeling carefully for the transom by means of the book, pulled it partly open, accomplishing the work without the slightest sound. This done, she put her arms around my knees and lifted me so that my ear was near the transom. She had held me there perhaps three minutes when I heard what sounded like a far distant chime faintly strike the hour of 3.

"Put me down," I whispered to Eleanor.

"Have you heard anything?" asked Eleanor.

"Yes; a chime."

She lowered me to the floor and, throwing her arms around my neck, gave me a bear hug.

"Now go and awaken some of the girls and bring them here," she said.

I did her bidding and collected every girl in the hall. Then Eleanor turned on the electric light and knocked gently on Sarah's door.

The door was unlocked, and we all went into the room. Eleanor went to the bed and from under a pillow took out the lost watch.

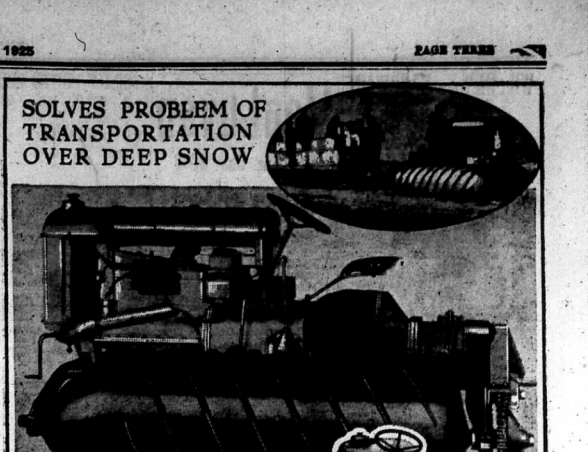

There was a chime strike in it, and Eleanor, knowing this, had based her operations on hearing it. But since the watch was under a pillow no one except with the keenest sense of hearing would have detected it.

The matter was hushed up on Roy's account, but we were no longer troubled with Miss Stearns.

Plants that Fight the Sea.

In the struggle to defend coasts from sea encroachments, coastal authorities have no better allies than the hardy tamarisk and shrubby sea blite. These useful plants are as effective in protecting the lonely stretches of our shores as stout sea walls and far-flung groynes. Take, for example, Shoreham, on the Sussex coast. This town was seriously affected by the incoming tides until it was found that the loose shingle that fringes the sea could be bound into a resisting mass by the extensive planting of tamarisk, a hardy little plant whose only real enemy is severe frost.

On the Norfolk coast of England the same method is adopted, but there the shifting shingle is bound with shrubby sea blite, which grows waist high and covers large areas of the coast. The more this plant is illtreated the stouter it flourishes. Occasionally a violent storm will result in then brushs being completely embedded in fresh shingle thrown up by the waves. This, in reality, is an advantage, as the plant puts forth new shoots that bind the fresh stones, still further strengthening the land rampart.

gers from one such community to another, and in fact does practically everything that an automobile or a tractor does in places where there is no snow.

The Snow Motor is a wierd looking contrivance which rides the crests of the deepest snow drifts, climbs over fences, stands on its double-barrelled nose and drags its great loads behind it without any apparent effort. As manufactured at present it is attached to Fordson tractors which provide its motive power. Later it will also be used on standard automobiles, so that it will travel at a rate of twenty-four miles an hour.

Stripped of its motive power it consists of two cigar shaped cylinders or drums to which flanges, resembling cork screws are attached. These cylinders literally float on the top of snow drifts, for they displace snow equal in weight to the weight of the machine, just as a boat displaces water in proportion to its own tonnage. For heavy hauling the Fordson Tractor stripped of its wheels and axles, is mounted on the Snow Motor and the cylinders are caused to revolve with the result that the Motor worms its way along by means of the screw arrangement on the cylinders. For lighter, or passenger, traffic, the wheels and axles of an automobile are removed and replaced by the Snow-Motor. In summer the wheels can be put back again.

In snowed-in districts, up to the present, every effort has been directed to find ways and means for the removal of snow as the only way of opening up traffic. Now, however, the Snow Motor comes along with its funny looking cylinders and floats merrily over soft snow drifts, and in fact any condition of snow and as it goes makes a road for light vehicles to follow immediately and, after thorough packing, for loads of any weight.

Such is the latest and most important addition to Mother Necessity's family of inventions. It is built by Snow Motors Incorporated in Detroit, Michigan, under the presidency and general management of A. F. Knoblock. It has already proven its ability to do the surprising stunts referred to above and there seems to be very little doubt that it will be in general use in mining and lumbering operations during the coming winter. It is expected that each succeeding winter will find some new use it can profitably be put to and it is difficult to imagine just where the limit of its adaptibility should be placed.

Necessity is the mother of invention. At least everybody says it is. They tell us that is why we have the telephone, the radio, the electric washing machine, the gramophone and bobbed-hair all members of old Mother Necessity's vast and ever growing family.

And now the transportation branch of the family circle has been added to by the advent of a very healthy and important youngster who has a bright and promising future ahead of him. He is called the Snow Motor, a name which was given him because of his amazing ability to make himself and anything that was attached to him as easily over six feet of snow as an ordinary wheeled vehicle does over a paved road.

The Snow Motor was invented by a man who has spent the greater part of his life in the snow-bound wildernesses of Alaska and whose livelihood depended upon his ability to transport himself and certain weighty commodities, such as lumber for instance, over vast snow-covered areas without losing either his life or his lumber.

It did not take more than a few winters in the frozen north to convince this gentleman, whose name by the way, is F. R. Burch, of Seattle, Washington, that there was something radically wrong in the matter of modern traffic in countries where very heavy falls of snow were common and inevitable occurrences. Not only was this true, he thought, in regard to the hauling of heavy loads but in the transportation of the inhabitants themselves who, are often quite unable to carry on the ordinary pursuits of life and business during the winter months: months when whole communities are either tied up as hopeless fight against the snow with sadly inadequate equipment or else, what is sadder still, resign themselves to being snow-bound for the winter and completely cut off from the rest of the world.

And so, urged on by Mother Necessity, Mr. Burch and his associates conceived the idea of the Snow Motor. And this is what the Snow Motor does. It floats over snow and, in floating, packs the snow down smoothly and makes a very satisfactory surface for other vehicles to travel over; it hauls twenty-ton loads over snow of any depth; it hauls them from the forest, ore from the mines, pulp wood to the mills, mail to rural snow-bound communities, passen-

Venezuela.

When the Spaniards landed on what is now Venezuela, on the northeastern coast of South America, in the year 1499, they observed some huts built upon piles, in an Indian village near Cora, in order to raise them above the stagnant water that covered the plain. This induced the Spaniards to give the region the name Venezuela, meaning little Venice.

Venezuela declared its independence in 1818, and this independence was recognized by Spain in 1845. Since then Venezuela has been the scene of many revolutions and much disorder and bloodshed.

Elephants' Shrewdness.

The elephant is probably the shrewdest and most adaptable of living animals and has no enemies except man. He eats anything that is green, and seems equally at home on the plains or in the forests and jungles, on the high mountain slopes or down in swampy lowlands. His trunk is one of the most extraordinary organs of nature. It contains the finest smelling apparatus on earth, and when the proximity of man is suspected the trunk is raised in the air and carefully turned in all directions, "feeling" for the man smell in the wind. Once an elephant gets that smell he does one of two things. He either retreats quietly and rapidly or charges. Years of experience in matching his wiles with those of man and his high-powered rifle has taught the elephant that it is safer to remain in the dense forests. An elephant can move through these forests with no more noise than would be made by a mouse, and the growth in these forests is frequently so impenetrable the hunter can make progress only by following the winding elephant trail.

Symbolism of Black Cat.

Superstition and black cats invariably go together. In fact the black cat has always been mixed up with omens, witchcraft, good or bad luck. According to common belief, if one enters the house it must not be driven out. If one is met in the street the omen is good, and if it should come and rub itself against us our luck is right in. Promptly if we stop and stroke it—to make quite certain. If that is your custom, do you know that you are propitiating the Evil One? Your ancestors in the Middle Ages hated black cats. They regarded them as being inhabited by Satan himself, or at any rate, by one of his evil spirits. So when they stroked a black cat it was not to bring good luck but to avert ill-luck. By pleasing the cat they turned the wrath of his wicked purpose. If you condemn the notion as silly and superstitious why do you continue "?

LIVINGSTONE'S WIFE

WAS A GREAT HELP TO FAMOUS MISSIONARY.

Mary Moffatt Is Highly Spoken of as a Model Housewife and Nurse—Buried In the Wilds of Africa In 1868.

Africa is not only the burial-place of brave men. The remains of great-hearted women also mingle with her soil, says a Cape Town paper.

And of all the women's graves in Africa, none is more impressive perhaps, than that of Mary Moffat, the wife of David Livingstone. Situated though it is in one of the most fever-stricken districts on the Zambesi, occasional passengers on the river boats will still make a special journey to Shupanga to pay tribute to the grave of a great woman and a noble wife.

Not very much is known about Mary Moffat (as she was before her marriage) except that she was one of the fine, brave, persevering women of the celebrated family of Moffat, who lived at the famous missionary station of Kuruman in Bechuanaland.

Mary Moffat is highly spoken of as a model housewife and a very capable nurse, and as the Kuruman station was the centre of a large missionary area, it is probable that she led a practical, and at times, an eventful life.

The young Scottish missionary, David Livingstone, had lived for nearly four years as a bachelor in the wilds of Africa before, as he himself has written, "I screwed up courage to put a question beneath one of the fruit trees, the result of which was that I became united in marriage to Mr. Moffat's eldest daughter, Mary."

The young missionary girl, having been born in this country, did not shrink from the prospect of leaving the homely mission-station, and going into the beautiful, but little-known Matebele valley, where she had, with his own hands, built their future home.

Their first year was one of supreme happiness, for besides building schools and a church, they had an excellent garden—a rare luxury in such a place as the Mabotse valley. Unfortunately they were forced to move to Chonuane, but even here they made an equally charming home among the Bakwain people. Their life is vividly described as consisting of "building, gardening, cobbling, doctoring, tinkering, carpentering, gun-mending, farriering, waggon-mending, preaching, schooling" . . . while Mrs. Livingstone made soap and candles and clothes.

She accompanied her husband on several important expeditions, taking her three children with her on the trip in search of Lake Ngami in 1850. After this journey, however, Livingstone decided to send them back to England, and he bade farewell in April, 1852.

They did not see each other again until the Christmas of 1857, when Livingstone returned to England for a period of eighteen months. What the great explorer's wife had endured during those five years may be gathered from the little poem of welcome she composed:—

"You'll never leave me, darling—
There's promise in your eye;
I may tend you while I'm living, you will watch me when I die.
How did I live without you through those long, long years of woe?
It seems as tho' 'twould kill me to be parted from you now.
And if death but kindly lead me to the blessed home on high,
What a hundred thousand welcomes will await you in the sky."

But it was not long before Livingstone tired of the daily round of life in a civilized world, and he was glad to return to Africa, this time accompanied by his wife and their youngest child, the others being left at home.

On arrival at the Cape, Mrs. Livingstone was ordered that she had to be left behind with her small son, while Consul Livingstone (as he had been created) while in England) proceeded into the country, of which the call was, to him, irresistible.

Nothing daunted by the tales of perilous journeys and strange tribes among which Livingstone's party had to move, Mrs. Livingstone and a party of English ladies arrived some time later to take up missionary work at several of the new stations that had been founded.

Tragedy befell the brave little party, however, for in a short while two deaths occurred, one being Bishop Mackenzie, of the Church of England Mission to Central Africa. Fever attacked the camp, and Mrs. Livingstone was one of the first to succumb, and after two days' illness heroically borne, she died on April 27, 1863.

The entries in Livingstone's journal just at this period convey something of the terrible grief he felt at his loss:—

"Kongone, May 11.—My dear, dear Mary has been this evening a fortnight in heaven. . . . For the first time in my life I feel willing to die. —D.L."

WILSON'S HARDWARE.

Two Autos Collide.

Saturday noon two automobiles collided at the corner of Dundas and West streets, near V. Cowling's general store. The one car was locally owned and the other was an American tourist car. The town car was coming south on West street, and the tourist car was travelling west on Dundas street. It is said the town car did not obey the traffic by-law and stop at the street intersection, and in consequence he collided with the American car, smashing the running board badly and necessitating a trip to a garage before it could proceed on its journey. The local car was not apparently damaged.

Aviation Camp to be Moved to Deseronto.

An announcement is expected soon of the transfer of the training quarters of the Royal Canadian Air Force from Camp Borden to the Mohawk Reserve, near Deseronto, on the Bay of Quinte. Such a move has been discussed for some time, and those in charge of the activities of the Air Force are strongly in favor of a removal to more serviceable quarters. Two reasons are given by those officials in favor of a move. One is that, with the development of the science of flying, both for war and peace purposes, it is essential that all fliers be given training both in water and land work. Even for civilian service in Canada, ability to handle hydroplanes is necessary. Another reason is that it would be greatly in the interests of economy to abandon Camp Borden, which was equipped for a force of 3,000 men, and now there are only 200 using it.

Golf.

Despite the rain at noon on Wednesday a team of fifteen players from the Bay of Quinte Golf Club, Belleville, came to Napanee for a game. Fortunately the weather cleared and an exceptionally pleasant time was spent by the members of the two Clubs. Although the Belleville Club had, as usual a very strong team, Napanee was able to win by a close margin. The result of the play was as follows :

Odessa Girl Dies as Result of Burns.

Miss Nellie Hilliard, aged nineteen years, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Hilliard, Odessa, died Tuesday at midnight, from the shock received from burns she suffered Monday, when her clothes caught on fire while working in her front yard. The girl had built a bonfire and was raking the yard, and going near the fire her clothes were ignited. It was very pathetic as the young lady's voice was affected and she could not cry for help when the accident happened. When her mother found her her dress was all afire and their hands were severely burned in an effort to extinguish the flames. The funeral of the deceased took place Wednesday afternoon at Wilton. Besides her parents, one brother mourns her loss.

Victorian Order of Nurses.

An interesting address was heard by those who met in the Town Hall last Friday night in response to the invitation which the local Committee of the Victorian Order of Nurses had issued to the people of the community. The speaker of the evening was Miss Smellie, Chief Superintendent of the V. O. N. in Canada. In a brief sketch of the history of public nursing the speaker traced to the present day the wonderful advance which has been made in this most important department of human welfare. The work of the V. O. N. in particular, has made steady progress, the organization being easily adapted to the special needs of the various committees in which it is established. The nurses of the Order have received special training, in addition to the ordinary nurses' course, to qualify them for work in homes of all kinds. The services of the Order are intended for the benefit of all classes, and all who can do so are expected to pay a small fee for the services which they receive. In addition to receipts from fees the expenses are met in various ways by different branches, but with increasing frequency substantial grants are made by municipal councils, being justified by the fact that the work of the V. O. N. frequently saves the municipality from heavier expenses in caring for unfortunates. Speaking of the work in Napanee, Miss Smellie commended the local committee on the fact that it was so thoroughly representative of the Town, and that it was organized on a solid and permanent foundation. Miss Smellie, in conclusion, gave a very interesting account of her experiences in attending the World Congress of Nurses held recently in Finland. Musical numbers were kindly contributed to the evening's programme by Mr. and Mrs. Seymour, Mr. Caldwell and Mr. Waite.

"Be ye followers of me even as I also am of Christ," 1 Cor. 11-1 ; "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have no charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal," 1 Cor. 13-1 ; "And though I bestw all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing. Charity suffereth long and is kind ; charity envieth not ; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil, rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth, beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Charity never faileth," 1 Cor. 13 : 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

WORLD'S DARK PLACES

TURKS, TARTARS, AND PIGMIES IN THEIR HOMES.

Vambery Tells of His Visits to Other Lands—Head-hunters of Borneo—Primitive Manhood — Land of Magic.

Arminius Vambery tells us in his fascinating book, "The Story of My Struggles," how he looked at the vast unexplored regions of Central Asia as a great land of romance. But his first night in a Bedouin encampment shattered the romance. He found himself up against the cold, hard fact of the queer customs and habits of wandering tribes of Turkestan and the East.

Vambery's books are full of interesting details about many strange peoples. He tells us about the filthy Hungarian beggars who frequented the market of the little town where he was brought up; also about the life and customs of the wandering gypsies and queer nomadic tribes of those great Moslem lands of the East.

The dervishes of Bokhara, a strange fanatical sect, interested him, and their queer superstitions and wild, whirling dances puzzled the wandering scholar. There is a vivid glimpse of a wild man of the Arabian desert living in a lonely cave, banished from the haunts of men as the result of a vendetta. Vambery, himself a Hungarian Jew, wandered for years in the East, passing as a devout Mohammedan pilgrim.

Among the strange wandering peoples of that great stretch of country which lies between the Black Sea and India are the Ozbegs, Kurds, Tartars, and Afghans. The Ozbegs hold a strange market which they attend dressed in their best and mounted on their finest steeds. The business is largely done on horseback. The Afghans are a hardy people who inhabit a wild, mountainous region, and the wild, lawless tribes of the Northwestern frontier of India have always been a source of trouble to the British Government.

Those who have studied the life and ways of the Turk have expressed the conviction that the fatalism of the Turkish religion, with its beliefs in Kismet and Allah, only ends in apathy and an unhealthy quietude.

New Guinea is a strange land about whose great, mountainous interior and its peoples little is known. Cannibal tribes still practice their horrible ritual in that island, and sorcery exercises a brutal and degrading influence. Yet these cannibal tribes are a fine race physically, and make splendid workers in the plantations.

Among the strange folk of the Malay Archipelago are the Dyaks of Borneo, at one time savage headhunters, whose huts were ornamented with the grinning skulls of their victims. The Malays used to be ruthless pirates, and their pro[illegible] were the scourge of Eastern seas. But pirates still haunt the rivers and creeks of the China coast.

Much has been written about the characteristic smells of towns and villages. But the villages of the Far East have their own peculiar smells, often due to the fact that they all lack a sewage scheme.

The effluvium of a Chinese village is due to the opium dens and the rotting soil, while the horrible odor of an Indian village betrays its presence long before the village is in sight. Many primitive peoples have their own peculiar smell.

Dr. Ossendowski, a Polish professor who has travelled extensively in Siberia and Mongolia, has told strange tales about the queer communities of these lands. Sometimes, this traveller assures us, some of the communities of the Frozen North have been reduced to cannibalism, while he describes one Tarbar village which was annihilated by an Arctic frost.

The inhabitants indulged in an orgy of drunkenness. The fires died out, for even the children were drunk or asleep, and so men and women were frozen to death.

The brutal life of the convict communities, and those Siberian stations to which people were banished under the Tsarist regime, have often been described. Such are among the sad people of the world, living a strange, starved, banished life in the wastes. Life in Mongolia, among the wandering Tartar tribes and nomadic Mongols of that great Northern land, tests the hardihood of the traveller.

Men like James Gilmour, the missionary, have lived a simple life, trying to reach the isolated communities of that barbarous race. The religion of the Mongols is a debased form of Buddhism, known as Lamaism, and Dr. Ossendowski has described the Buddhist leader of Urga as a crafty drunken, blind lama. The Mogolian lama, with his praying wheel, is among the queer figures of the world.

Africa contains many strange people, from the Bushmen in the south to the queer, pigmy folk of the great Congo forest regions of the northwest. Stanley was the first to traverse the dense forests of these people, and it was only after he had seen them that Europe heard of the strange dwarf people of Central Africa. The dense forest region where these people dwell covers some 300,000 square miles, or some six times the area of England.

Superstition abounds in Africa. The power of the witch-doctor is supreme among the native tribes, and Ju-ju dominates the mind of the Negro. In Nigeria superstitious practices and magic hold sway over certain tribes such as the Ibibio. Here witchcraft has held undisputed sway for centuries.

HELP NAPANEE TO ORGANIZE S. A. BAND

Launching a movement which will mean the organization of a Salvation Army Band at Napanee, members of the S. A. Band of Belleville, put on a week-end program in Napanee Armouries, under the direction of Bandmaster D. Wardle. On Saturday evening, Mayor Dr. Ming occupied the chair and read an illuminated address to the band. It said :

"To the Band-master and members of the Belleville Salvation Army Band.

"It is with a great deal of pleasure that as Mayor of the town of Napanee I welcome you to Napanee. Your band has been heard by us on several occasions and we have been delighted with your music. We are not unmindful of the great work which the Salvation Army is doing and has been doing for many years, and we especially remember the noble and unsacrificing service given by the Salvation Army overseas in the Great War and the subsequent work done by them after our returned soldiers arrived home.

"We would like also to take occasion at this time to praise the Army for the good work they are doing in the Town of Napanee. No labor in the christian field and social field is too arduous for them to undertake and we believe there is no organization with us that gives so efficient and satisfactory service.

"In conclusion, we again welcome you and trust your short sojourn among us will be pleasant and your labors fruitful."

Yours sincerely,
Sgd. EDWARD MING,
Mayor.

Napanee, Sept. 12th, 1925.

Three programmes were given on Sunday at the armouries, Capt. T. D. Ruston presiding at the afternoon meeting.

Captain F. Milner, of the Napanee corp, and her assistant, Lieut. Spicer, and the members of the Napanee corp expressed their appreciation of the visit of the Belleville organization.

Napanee corps intends to have a band and instruments will be purchased.

Somebody asked him why.

"Well," said he, "it's this way —they appear to protect the property without obstructin' the view."—Topics.

DEAD ON A LONELY ROAD

By ERWIN GREER
(President Greer College of Automotive Engineering, Chicago)

Don't get excited over this title reader. One might suppose that I intend writing about the villian who kills the poor engine on a dark road that "our Nell" may be put over the jumps. Not so! That story will come later. What I refer to is the blankety blank car that lays down and dies when you are miles from a service station. If you haven't had such an experience you're bound to eventually. Instead of spending the night cursing an innocent engine the big idea is to get it turning over again. Here is the way you should go about locating the trouble.

The first thing to do is to look into the gas tank. If there is no gasoline you can expect dirty laughter from friend wife, or the person you have with you. Let's hope there is gas, but understand that gasoline in the big tank does not mean gasoline in the vacuum tank or the carburetor, so flood the carburetor—if you can. If it won't flood, tap on the gas line, which may loosen the particle that is causing the trouble. If not there is nothing else to do but pull the gas line down and trace the impediment that way.

But if you are positive the fuel is flowing freely and still the engine won't start, the trouble may lie in the ignition system. If the starter won't turn the engine look to your battery and the terminals. These sometimes corrode and break off. This is easily repaired.

How about the primary circuit? Remove the distributor head, turn the switch to the "on" position back and forth with the fingers, and then move the breaker points If a spark is seen why you are all right there. If you can't get the spark why turn the engine over by hand a couple of times and try again. No spark yet ? Then the trouble is in the primary circuit and you must trace through the battery, its connections, the primary coil connections, switch and so on.

A spark-plug with the terminal attached can be unscrewed, left on top of the engine which is then turned over by hand. If the plug fires all is well. If the plug doesn't fire the trouble must be traced further. Or by testing the high tension ahead of the distributor (removing the high tension coil wire and holding it about 1-16 of an inch away from its post while the engine is cranked) the tale will be told. If a spark jumps the gap, the high tension as far as the coil is all right. Your trouble will be found beyond the coil.

So, if the carburetor is full of gas, and the wiring appears O.K. the failure of the engine to start is probably caused by some timing or valve derangement. In this case, old fellow, you're totally out of luck unless you happen to be an experienced mechanic.

But it is ten to one that the trouble will be found in the gas line or the ignition system.

The Golden Acre

It Was Half a Century Before It Produced Crops

By F. A. MITCHEL

In 1850 Elihu Deane and Herbert Dodsworth got into a lawsuit over a piece of prairie land located a couple of miles from the center of the city of Chicago. The property was worth nothing, and the expenses of the suit were heavy. They were advised by their lawyers to meet with a view to effecting a compromise. They came together, and Deane said to Dodsworth:

"It is impossible for either you or me to realize anything out of this acre of worthless land. We're too old. But I think there's going to be a big city here some day, and the property in, say, fifty years from now may come within the town limits. It will then be worth something. Suppose we leave it jointly to our heirs?"

"That would be like dividing an apple into a couple of dozen parts. Families multiply, and I doubt if the inheritance will ever be worth more than, say, a hundred dollars. Suppose we arrange so that it shall go to one person yet unborn?"

Dodsworth was ready for any proposition that would relieve him of further bother concerning the property, and legal documents were drawn up bequeathing it to such descendant of either as should be nearest to twenty years old on June 1, 1900. Both men were over fifty at the time the arrangement was made, and both had sons and daughters.

But none of these sons or daughters took the slightest interest in the property that had, so to speak, been put away for the enjoyment of some one yet unborn. If, indeed, any of them ever visited it they saw a part of the prairie, on which, after a rain, stood a pool of water varying from one to twelve inches in depth.

When forty years had rolled round neither Deane nor Dodsworth nor any child of either was living. There were many grandchildren, none of whom knew anything about the acre of property that had been tied up for half a century. Before the death of the testators a fund had been provided from which the taxes were to be paid, and a certain firm of lawyers were to pay them. In 1890 this firm dissolved, and the duty devolved upon their successors. By this time the property had become a snug fortune, and there was no danger of any Deane or Dodsworth who lived in Chicago not knowing something about it. But both families had spread out familiwe and had scattered.

In 1898 Ackley & Thorp, attorneys, were charged with the payment of the taxes on the acre, and the sums were sufficiently large to be noticeable. Sidney Walker, a young man who had just been admitted to the bar, was a clerk in the office of Ackley & Thorp, and the payment of the taxes was intrusted to him. In this way he came to a knowledge of the strange joint will of Deane and Dodsworth. It occurred to Walker that when the time should come round to put the property into the hands of the legitimate heir it would be important that all the members of the Deane and Dodsworth families should be accounted for. Realizing that whoever did this work would doubtless be paid for it, he began a search for every member of both families. But he kept his investigation to himself.

Roger Deane, aged twenty-two, a grandson of Elihu Deane, a party to the will made in 1850, resided in Chicago between 1890 and 1900 and had his eye on the acre as being the possible heir. He was a member of most of the clubs of the city and prominent socially. He hunted up all the Deanes and Dodsworths he could find. There was one nearer than he as being the required age. But he found one Dodsworth, a woman about his own age, who might be nearer than he. He made inquiries as to her age, but she declined to give it on the ground that a woman's age is her private property. The truth is that if he knew her age and it was nearer the prize than his he might prepare himself to prove that he was older or younger than she was.

Miss Julia Dodsworth was equally as prominent in society as Roger Deane, and the possession of property worth several hundred thousand dollars would be as much of an advantage to her as to him. She therefore concluded to cultivate him, "with a view to getting out of him his age. Neither would be on June 1, 1900, much less than two years above twenty, but no one of the descendants of the original Deane or Dodsworth had turned up nearer the required age, and it seemed probable that one or the other of these two would get the fortune.

As the time drew near for the turning over the acre to the designated heir Messrs. Ackley & Thorp wrote to the Deanes and Dodsworths to state their ages. Roger Deane and Julia Dodsworth were included in the inquiries. Each had been endeavoring to learn the other's age, but neither had succeeded. Therefore neither had any advantage over the other in this respect. There was nothing for either to do but give the true date of birth.

Soon after doing so each received a letter saying that both had been born on the same day, and that under the will inoperative since it distinctly specified that the property be turned over on the 1st of June, 1900, to the one person nearest to twenty years of age. No one had yet appeared to be nearer than they to the designated age, but the property, under a literal interpretation of the will, could not be given to either.

Roger Deane and Julia Dodsworth visited the attorneys with a view to a compromise. They at first suggested that the property be divided between them. But the lawyers would not do this without an order from the court of chancery. Deane took the man of law aside and asked him if marriage would settle the matter. The reply was that though man and wife were to the certain respects in the eye of the law they were not in all respects. After much delay the lawyer suggested that the only way out of the matter was for one to lay claim to the estate and the other to dispute the claim. This would bring the matter before the court, who would give a decision.

However, nothing could be done before the 1st of June next, and that was still three months distant. Meanwhile Roger Deane and Julia Dodsworth had a common interest. They met quite often with a view to finding some way by which they might at least finding the inheritance. It was suggested that they hunt up the doctors who presided at their birth in order to discover which had been born at the earlier hour of the day. Deane was successful on his part. He found the doctor who brought him into the world, who by reference to certain notes he had taken down with regard to his patients found a record that Roger had been born at 2 o'clock in the morning of April 10, 1878. This, the lawyer said, would not give him the property unless proof was adduced that Miss Dodsworth had been born at a later hour of the day. So Deane was congratulated for Deane. And as for Miss Dodsworth, it simply meant that by hunting up her own record she would run twelve chances to one of giving the property to Deane.

By this time this matter of mutual interest had drawn them so closely together that if it could have been settled by their marriage there would have been no further difficulty.

Miss Dodsworth remembered that a woman named McCann had lived with her mother as housekeeper or upper servant for many years. When Julia was about twelve years of age Mrs. McCann had left the family. She was with them when Julia was born and might remember the hour of her birth. Julia began a system of advertising for the woman, and a response was finally elicited. She wrote Julia that she had kept a letter blank book, in which she had noted important events. This book was, with other effects, in a trunk in a garret of one of Mrs. McCann's relatives. She would get it and see if it contained the required information.

While waiting for this Julia told Roger about it. Roger said that if the book contained a memorandum of the hour of Julia's birth he or she would inherit the property, as he had equal chances to one of being the heir. Then he told her that he had become attached to her and proposed that, whether he or she or neither the one nor the other inherited, they pass the rest of their lives as man and wife. Julia was of the same mind, and they plighted their troth, their union to take place irrespective of the time they had come to call the golden acre.

A few days after their betrothal Mrs. McCann sent her notebook by registered mail to Julia. Julia turned over the leaves hastily till she came to May and June, 1878, and there found an entry: "At 10 o'clock in the morning of April 10, a little girl was born."

Stamps That Are Worth Fortunes.

A few days ago, writes a philatelist in a London paper, a young stamp collector who had been about six months at this fascinating hobby, told me he had been offered a certain collection for £2 and refused it. Among other stamps it contained he mentioned that there was a specimen of the 1851 edition of Hawaii 13 cents.

"What!" I gasped. "Refused that for £2? Why, the collection was worth securing for the one stamp alone."

My friend's jaw dropped when I told him that particular stamp to-day is worth anything from £75 to £100.

There are several other even more valuable stamps for which a sharp look-out should always be kept. Probably the best-known example is the 1847 edition of Mauritius, originally issued at 2d. The last price quoted for good copies of this stamp was 400 guineas.

Another rare stamp is the 1858 edition of Moldavia 81 parale. Occasionally this is quoted at £200 a specimen, but the price has been up as high as £350.

There are some early editions of Great Britain which may be named. The higher values of the 1878 edition watermarked with Maltese crosses are all valuable, that for 10s. being worth about £6, while the stamp originally issued at £1 fetches from £4 to £10 according to its condition.

Some of the stamps issued in 1880, especially those with the rose on spray watermark, are very valuable, the 2s. red-brown being worth about £14 unusued and £12 used.

A very sharp watch should also be kept for American stamps issued in 1845. Two very valuable ones are St. Louis and Alexandria, worth about £200 each, while that of Newhaven in the same year is worth little less.

"Beak" for Magistrate.

A professor in one of our universities, was irrevantly known among his students as "The Beak," because of the prominence of his nose. Which, that is usually the sense in which the word is used, yet it is frequently applied to a magistrate and its use in that sense is explained in several ways. Long ago, thieves' slang had "beak" for constable, in exactly the same sense of a "nosey-parker," a man whose business it was to find out just the things that he wasn't meant to find out. And from the policeman to the magistrate the change would be easy. Amongst other explanations, however, that have been offered is the fact that "beak" is a very old Saxon word which was the name of the gold collar once worn as an emblem of authority. Scholars interested in language have suggested that though we have long forgotten the original word, we have kept its corruption as standing for a magistrate.

Not Going With a Trip.

The sturdy individualism of the Scot was recently demonstrated at a revival meeting when the preacher, who felt that his words had produced the desired effect upon his congregation, requested all present who wanted to go to heaven to hold up their hands. The response was unanimous, with the exception of one man. "Do you not wish to go to Heaven?" the preacher asked this man. "It's a' richt about going to Heaven," he replied; "but I'm no guan wi' a trip."

Interested at Last.

In a certain English village school there was a pupil whose name was Ivor. Now, Ivor possessed a vivid imagination and spent most of his pocket-money on the pictures.

Naturally, he did not often find the school subjects so interesting as those illustrated by his favorite stars. But one day the teacher told the children of her encounter with a tramp.

With dramatic gestures she reached the climax of her story, and then concluded by saying:

"And then I fainted."

Young Ivor, interested at last, gazed at his teacher with admiration and awe writ largely on his face. He was the first to break the silence.

"With yer left or yer right?" he asked.

A Parrot In the Rectory.

Birds of brilliant plumage, as well as curios of many sorts, were brought home to the Maritime Provinces by sailors who went from its harbors to the ports of the Seven Sea. Charles G. D. Roberts in his lecture before the Poetry Society the other evening told of a parrot which had been brought from a Southern country by a sailor and given to his father, Canon Roberts, while living in the southern part of New Brunswick. Family prayers in the morning were a regular and solemn part of the day's life at the rectory. One morning the maid brought the parrot to the dining-room and set the cage on the table. The bird had been in the house for some weeks and had not said a word. The maid thought he might learn by associating with the family.

"At the end of one prayer," said Mr. Roberts, "the parrot walked out of the cage, down the table, opened his beak and let out a string of language that was not at all appropriate. He seemed to think, 'I am with my friends; I will use the same language as I have been accustomed to.' After that the parrot was another bird. He spoke fluently, and, strange to say, he would not have anything to do with any one but his father. He rode around on father's shoulder and whispered into his ear, and father loved him just as much as he loved father."

Vegetable Values.

Among nature's remedies for physical ailments are the ordinary vegetables grown in our gardens. Potatoes, for instance, are good for the liver. People who suffer from rheumatism should eat celery, while garlic —that strong-smelling onion—should be taken for asthma. Lettuces supply iron to the system, and onions are good for sleeplessness. They are also useful as a sedative for the complexion. The truth of the "apple a day" maxim has been proved time and again. An apple eaten every day will keep you healthy. Apples purify the system and improve the nerves, as well as supplying necessary foods to the brain.

Funny Farewells.

Whatever dallying may have preceded it, the actual parting of a Briton and his sweetheart is usually sealed with a kiss. To us this seems the natural thing to do, but other nations have different ideas.

The Turkish lover bows low, his hands crossed reverently on his breast. This is a dignified farewell compared with that of the amorous Japanese, who, on leaving his sweetheart, removes a slipper and brandishes it in the air! Lovers in New Guinea have the pleasing habit on parting of exchanging slabs of chocolate, while the lovesick man of the Philippine Isles vigorously rubs his sweetheart's cheeks before leaving her.

"But you'll come over here for breakfast in the morning?"

"You want me?"

"Certainly."

"I'd like to come very much."

"Then I'll expect you." She followed him to the door when he had put on his things, and he made no objection when she asked that the man he allowed to carry his bag around to the other house.

When he had dismissed Simons and re-entered the house on Astor street, he found no evidences of any disturbance while he had been out. On the second floor, to the east of the room which had been his father's, was a bedroom which evidently had been kept as a guest chamber; Alan carried his suitcase there and made ready for bed.

The sight of Constance Sherrill standing and watching after him in concern as he started back to this house, came to him again and again, and, her flush when she had spoken of the friend against whom Benjamin Corvet had warned her. Who was he? It had been impossible at that moment for Alan to ask her more; besides, if he had asked and she had told him, he would have learned only a name which he could not place yet in any connection with her or with Benjamin Corvet. Whoever he was, it was plain that Constance Sherrill "thought of him;" lucky man, Alan said to himself. Yet Corvet had warned her not to think of him.

Alan turned back his bed. It had been for him a tremendous day. Barely twelve hours before he had come to that house, Alan Conrad from Blue Rapids, Kan., now . . . phrases from what Lawrence Sherrill had told him of his father were running through his mind as he opened the door of the room to be able to hear any noise in Benjamin Corvet's house, of which he was sole protector. The emotion roused by his first sight of the lake went through him again as he opened the window to the east.

Now—he was in bed—he seemed to be standing, a specter before a man blaspheming Benjamin Corvet and the souls of men dead. "And the hole above the eye! . . . So it's you that got you! . . . So it's you that got Ben! . . . I'll get you! . . . You can't save the Miwaka!"

The Miwaka! The stir of that name was stronger now even than before; it had been running through his consciousness almost constantly since he had heard it. He jumped up and turned on the light and found a pencil. He did not know how to spell the name and it was now necessary to write it down; the name had taken on that definiteness and ineffaceableness of a thing which, once heard, can never again be forgotten. And, in panic that he might forget, he wrote it, guessing at the spelling—"Miwaka."

It was a name, of course; but the name of what? It repeated and repeated itself to him, before he got back into bed, until its very iteration made him drowsy.

Outside, the gale whistled and shrieked. The wind, passing its last resistance after its sweep across the prairies before it leaped upon the lake, battered and clamored in its assault about the house. But as Alan became sleepier, he heard it no longer as it rattled the windows and howled under the eaves and over the roof, but as out on the lake, above the roaring and ice-crunching waves, it whipped and circled with its chill the ice-shrouded sides of struggling ships. So, with the roar of surf and gale in his ears, he went to sleep with the sole conscious connection in his mind between himself and these people, among whom Benjamin Corvet's summons had brought him, the one name "Miwaka."

CHAPTER VI.

The Deed in Trust.

Memory, if Alan could call it that, had given him a feeling for ships and for the lake. But these recollections were only what those of a three-years' child might have been. Not only did they refuse to connect themselves with anything else, but by the very frailty of their isolation, they warned him that they—and perhaps a few more vague memories of similar sort—were all that recollection ever would give him. He caught himself together and turned his thoughts to the approaching visit to Sherrill—and his father's offices. He had accepted Constance Sherrill's invitation to drive him downtown to his destination.

Observing the towering buildings to his right, he was able to identify some of the more prominent structures, familiar from photographs of the city. Constance drove swiftly, a few blocks down this boulevard; then, with a sudden, "Here we are!" she slowed the car to the curb and stopped. She led Alan into one of the tallest and best-looking buildings.

On several of the doors opening upon the wide marble hall where the elevator left them, Alan saw the names, "Corvet, Sherrill and Spearman."

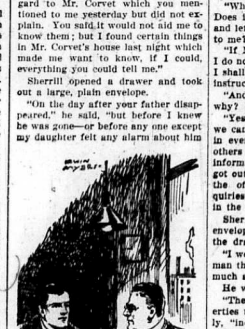

Constance led the way on past to a door farther down the corridor, which bore merely "the name, "Lawrence Sherrill"; evidently Sherrill, who had interests aside from the shipping business, had offices connected with but not actually a part of the offices of Corvet, Sherrill and Spearman. A girl on guard at the door, saying that Mr. Sherrill had been awaiting Mr. Conrad, opened an inner door and led Alan into a large, many-windowed room, where Sherrill was sitting alone before a table-desk. He pulled the "visitor's chair" rather close to his desk and to his own big leather chair before asking Alan to seat himself.

"You wanted to tell me, or ask me, something last night, my daughter has told me," Sherrill said cordially: "I'm sorry I wasn't home when you came back."

"I wanted to ask you, Mr. Sherrill," Alan said, "about those facts in regard to Mr. Corvet which you mentioned to me yesterday but did not explain. You said it would not aid me to know them; but I found certain things in Mr. Corvet's house last night which made me want to know, if I could, everything you could tell me."

Sherrill opened a drawer and took out a large, plain envelope.

"On the day after your father disappeared," he said, "but before I knew he was gone—or before any one except my daughter felt any alarm about him

Sherrill Opened a Drawer and Took Out a Large, Plain Envelope.

—I received a short note from him. The note was agitated, almost incoherent. It told me he had sent for you—Alan Conrad, of Blue Rapids, Kansas—but spoke of you as though you were some one I ought to have known about, and commended you to my care. The remainder of it was merely an agitated, almost indecipherable farewell to me. When I opened the envelope, a key had fallen out. The note made no reference to the key, but, comparing it with one I had in my pocket, I saw that it appeared to be a key to a safety deposit box in the vaults of a company where we both had boxes.

"The note, taken in connection with my daughter's alarm about him, made it so plain that something serious had happened to Corvet, that my first thought was merely for him. Corvet was not a man with whom one could readily connect the thought of suicide; but, Alan, that was the idea I had. I hurried at once to his house, but the bell was not answered, and I could not get in. His servant, Wassquam, has very few friends, and the few times he has been away from home of recent years have been when he visited an acquaintance of his—the head porter in a South Side hotel. I went to the telephone in the house next door and called the hotel and found Wassquam there. I told him over the telephone only that something was wrong, and hurried to my own home to get the key, which I had, to the Corvet house; but when I came back and let myself into the house, I found it empty and with no sign of anything having happened.

"The next morning, Alan, I went to the safe deposit vaults as soon as they were open. I presented the numbered key and was told that it belonged to a box rented by Corvet, and that Corvet had arranged about three days before for me to have access to the box if I presented the key. I had only to sign my name in their book and open the box. In it, Alan, I found the pictures of you which I showed you yesterday and the very strange communications that I am going to show you now."

Sherrill opened the long envelope, from which several thin, folded papers fell. He picked up the largest of these, which consisted of several sheets fastened together with a clip, and handed it to Alan without comment. Alan, as he looked at it and turned the pages, saw that it contained two columns of typewriting carried from page to page after the manner of an account.

The column to the left was an inventory of property and profits and income by months and years, and the one to the right was a list of losses and expenditures. Beginning at an indefinite day or month in the year 1895, there was set down in a lump sum what was indicated as the total of Benjamin Corvet's holdings at that time. To this, in sometimes undated items, the increase had been added. In the opposite column, beginning apparently from the same date in 1895, were the missing man's expenditures.

Alan having ascertained that the papers contained only this account, looked up questioningly to Sherrill; but Sherrill, without speaking, merely handed him the second of the papers. Alan unfolded it and saw that it was a letter written in the same hand which had written the summons he had received in Blue Rapids and had made the entries in the little memorandum book of the remittances that had been sent to John Welton.

It began simply:

"Lawrence—

"This will come to you in the event that I am not able to carry out the plan upon which I am now, at last, determined. You will find with this a list of my possessions. Deeds for all real estate executed and complete except for recording of the transfer at the county office; bonds, certificates, and other documents representing my ownership of properties, together with signed forms for their legal transfer to you, are in this box. These properties, in their entirety, I give to you in trust to hold for the young man now known as Alan Conrad of Blue Rapids, Kan., to deliver and transfer over to him or to continue to hold in all in trust for him as you shall consider to be to his greatest advantage.

"This for the reasons which I shall have told to you or which you cannot know which one of you now, nor do I know how I shall tell it. But when you learn, Lawrence, think as well of me as you can and help him to be charitable to me.

"With the greatest affection,

"BENJAMIN CORVET."

Alan, as he finished reading, looked up to Sherrill, bewildered and dazed.

"What does it mean, Mr. Sherrill? Does it mean that he has gone away and left everything he had—everything to me?"

"If Mr. Corvet does not return, and I do not receive any other instructions, I shall take over his estate, as he has instructed, for your advantage."

"And, Mr. Sherrill, he didn't tell you why? This is all you know?"

"Yes; you know everything now. All we can do, Alan, is to search for him in every way we can. There will be others searching for him too now; for information of his disappearance has got out. There have been reporters at the office this morning making inquiries, and his disappearance will be in the afternoon papers."

Sherrill put the papers back in their envelope, and the envelope back into the drawer, which he relocked.

"I went over all this with Mr. Spearman this morning," he said. "He is as much at a loss to explain it as I am."

He was silent for a few moments.

"The transfer of Mr. Corvet's properties to me for you," he said suddenly, "includes, as you have seen, Corvet's interest in the firm of Corvet, Sherrill & Spearman." I went very carefully through the deeds and transfers in the deposit box, and it was plain that, while he had taken great care with the forms of transfer for all the properties, he had taken particular pains with whatever related to his holdings in this company and to his shipping interests. If I make over the properties to you, Alan, I shall begin with those; for it seems to me that your father was particularly anxious that you should take a personal as well as a financial place among the men who control the traffic of the lakes. I have told Spearman that this is my intention. He has not left me time to see it my way as yet; but he may change his views, I think, after meeting you."

Sherrill got up. Alan arose a little unsteadily. The list of properties that he had read and the letter and Sherrill's statement portended so much that its meaning could not all come to him at once. He followed Sherrill through a short passage connecting the offices, files lettered "Corvet, Sherrill, and Spearman," into the large room he had seen when he came in with Constance. They crossed this, and Sherrill, without knocking, opened the door of an office marked, "Mr. Spearman." Alan, looking on past Sherrill as the door opened, saw that there were some half dozen men in the room, smoking and talking. His gaze went swiftly past these men to the one who, half seated on the top of the flat desk, had been talking to them; and his pulse closed into a throb with a shock; he started, choked with astonishment, then swiftly forced himself under control. For this was the man whom he had met and whom he had fought in Benjamin Corvet's house the night before—the big man surprised in his blasphemy of Corvet and of souls "in h—l" who, at sight of an apparition with a bullet hole above its eye, had cried out in his fright, "You got Ben! But you won't get me—d—n you! D—n you!"

Alan's shoulders drew up slightly, and the muscles of his hands tightened, as Sherrill led him to this man, Sherrill put his hand on the man's shoulder; his other hand was still on Alan's arm.

"Henry," he said to the man, "this is Alan Conrad, Alan, I want you to know my partner Mr. Spearman."

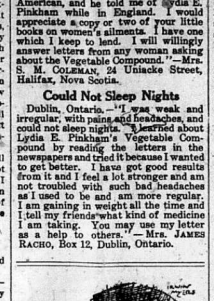

Spearman nodded an acknowledgment, but did not put out his hand; his eyes—steady, bold, watchful eyes that arranged about three days before for me to have access to the box if I presented the key. I had only to sign my name in their book and open the box. In it, Alan, I found the pictures of you which I showed you yesterday and the very strange communications that I am going to show you now."

Sherrill opened the long envelope, from which several thin, folded papers fell. He picked up the largest of these, which consisted of several sheets fastened together with a clip, and handed it to Alan without comment. Alan, as he looked at it and turned the pages, saw that it contained two columns of typewriting carried from page to page after the manner of an account.

The column to the left was an inventory of property and profits and income by months and years, and the one to the right was a list of losses and expenditures. Beginning at an indefinite day or month in the year 1895, there was set down in a lump sum what was indicated as the total of Benjamin Corvet's holdings at that time. To this, in sometimes undated items, the increase had been added. In the opposite column, beginning apparently

She Is Willing to Answer Letters from Women Asking About Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Steady, Bold, Watchful Eyes Seemed Measuring Alan Attentively.

Halifax, Nova Scotia.—"I am a maternity nurse and have recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to many women who were ailing, also to women who need a good tonic. I am English and my husband is American, his told me of Lydia E. Pinkham while in England. I would appreciate a copy or two of your little books on women's ailments. I have one which I keep by me. I will willingly answer letters from any woman asking about the Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. M. COLEMAN, 24 Uniacke Street, Halifax, Nova Scotia.

Could Not Sleep Nights

Dublin, Ontario.—"I was weak and irregular, with pains and headaches, and could not sleep nights. I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound by reading the letters in the newspapers and tried it because I wanted to get better. I have got good results from it and I feel a lot stronger and am not troubled with such bad headaches as I used to be and am more regular. I am gaining in weight all the time and I tell my friends what kind of medicine I am taking. You may use my letter as a help to others."—Mrs. JAMES RACHO, Box 12, Dublin, Ontario.

pear to them only an ordinary introduction.

Alan fought sharply down the swift rush of his blood and the tightening of his muscles.

"I can say truly that I'm glad to meet you, Mr. Spearman," he managed.

There was no recognition of anything beyond the mere surface meaning of the words in Spearman's slow smile of acknowledgment, as he turned from Alan to Sherrill.

"I'm afraid you've taken rather a bad time, Lawrence. Can't we get together later—this afternoon? You'll be about, Conrad, this afternoon?"

"I think I can be here this afternoon," Alan said.

"Let's say two-thirty, then." Spearman turned and noted the hour almost mechanically among the scrawled appointments on his desk pad; straightening, after this act of dismissal, he walked with them to the door, his hand on Sherrill's shoulder.

"Circumstances have put us—Mr. Sherrill and myself—in a very difficult position, Conrad," he remarked. "We want much to be fair to all concerned—"

He did not finish the sentence, but halted at the door. Sherrill went out, and Alan followed him; exasperation—half outrage yet half admiration—at Spearman's bearing, held Alan speechless. If, every movement of the man's great, handsome body had not recalled to him their struggle of the night before—if, as Spearman's hand rested cordially on Sherrill's shoulder, Alan had not seemed to feel again the big hand at his throat—he would almost have been ready to believe that this was not the man whom he had fought. He could not doubt that; he had recognized Spearman beyond question. And Spearman had recognized him—he was sure of that; he could not for an instant doubt it; Spearman had known it was the man whom he had fought in Corvet's house even before Sherrill had brought them together. Was there not further proof of that in Spearman's subsequent manner toward him? For what was all this cordiality except defiance?

Power and possession—both far exceeding Alan's most extravagant dream—were promised him by those doors which Sherrill had shown him. When he had read down the list of those properties, he had had no more feeling that such things could be his than he had had at first that Corvet's house could be his—until he had seen the intruder moving in that house. And now it was the sense that another was going to make him fight for those properties that was bringing to him the realization of his new power. He "had" something on that man—on Spearman. He did not know what that thing was; no stretch of his thought, nothing that he knew about himself or others, could tell him; but, at sight of him, in the dark of Corvet's house, Spearman had cried out in horror, he had screamed at him the name of a sunken ship, and in terror had buried his electric torch. It was true, Spearman's terror had not been at Alan Conrad; it had been because Spearman had mistaken him for some one else—for a ghost. But, after learning that Alan was not a ghost, Spearman's attitude had not very greatly changed; he had fought, he had been willing to kill rather than to be caught there.

Alan thought an instant; he would make sure he still "had" that something on Spearman and would learn how far it went. He took up the receiver and asked for Spearman.

A voice answered—"Yes."

Alan said, evenly: "I think you and I had better have a talk before we meet with Mr. Sherrill this afternoon. I am here in Mr. Corvet's office now and will be here for half an hour. then I'm going out."

Spearman made no reply, but hung up the receiver. Alan sat waiting, his watch upon the desk before him—tense, expectant, with flushes of hot and cold passing over him. Ten minutes passed; then twenty. The telephone under Corvet's desk buzzed.

"Mr. Spearman says he will give you five minutes now," the switchboard girl said.

Alan breathed deep with relief; Spearman had wanted to refuse to see him—but he had not refused; he had sent for him within the time Alan had appointed and after waiting until just before it expired.

Alan put his watch back into his pocket and, crossing to the other office, found Spearman alone. There was no pretense of courtesy now in Spearman's manner; he sat motionless at his desk, his bold eyes fixed on Alan intently. Alan closed the door behind him and advanced toward the desk.

"I thought we'd better have some explanation," he said, "about our meeting last night."

"Our meeting?" Spearman repeated; his eyes had narrowed watchfully.

"You told Mr. Sherrill that you were in Duluth and that you arrived home in Chicago only this morning. Of course you don't mean to stick to that story with me?"

"What are you talking about?" Spearman demanded.

"Of course, I know exactly where you were a part of last evening; and you know that I know. I only want to know what explanation you have to offer."

Spearman leaned forward, "Talk sense and talk it quick, if you have anything to say to me," he said.

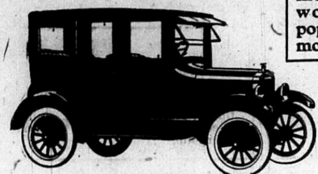

"I haven't told Mr. Sherrill that I found you at Corvet's house last night; but I don't want you to doubt for a minute that I know you—and about Ben Corvet's death. Sherrill and your cry about saving the Miwaka!"

A flash of blood came to Spearman's face; Alan, in his excitement, was sure of it; but there was just that flash, no more. He turned, while Spearman sat chewing his cigar and staring at him, and went out and partly closed the door. Then, suddenly, he reopened it, looked in, reclosed it sharply, and went on his way, shaking a little. For, as he looked back this second time at the dominant, determined man, alone seated at his desk, what he had seen in Spearman's face was fear; fear of himself, of Alan Conrad of Blue Rapids—yet it was not fear of that sort which weakens or dismays; it was of that sort which, merely warning of danger close at hand, determines one to use every means within his power to save himself.

Alan, still trembling excitedly, crossed to Corvet's office to await Sherrill. It was not, he felt sure now, Alan Conrad that Spearman was opposing; it was not even the apparent successor to the controlling stock of Corvet, Sherrill and Spearman. That man Spearman's fear

A Meal In a Monument.

Most visitors to Windsor Great Park have seen the equestrian statue of George III. which stands at the far end of the Broad Walk.

It is a huge statue, and when it was erected in 1823 the horse's body was first set up, then its head fixed, and lastly the figure of the king was seated upon his steed. Just before the head was fixed one of the officials of the castle, and six friends, had dinner inside the body of the horse. After all parts of the statue had been closed up and hermetically sealed, they remembered that a short ladder had been left inside. That ladder is there still.

Pranks We Play Afloat

Certain standard practical jokes in the navy are of ancient origin and tradition. Sailors, petty officers, and midshipmen sleep in hammocks on board ship. A well-known trick with a new recruit is to unfasten the hammock after it has been secured between its hooks or bars, and sling it up again with what is known as a "slippery hitch." As soon as any weight goes on the hammock, this particular knot draws, and lets the unfortunate sleeper down with a bump on the deck, writes Lieut.Com. Kenworthy, R.N., M.P.

A more dangerous and spiteful joke is to cut the hammock down. It then falls with a crash, and may seriously hurt the person in it. We used to forbid the cutting down of hammocks, and it was considered as not playing the game to perpetrate this "joke."

On Guest Nights in the gun-room, the mess-room of the midshipmen, sub-lieutenant, and clerks, we used to invite greenhorns to engage in a competition of balancing a coin on the forehead and dropping it into a funnel stuck into the waistcoat. When the unsuspecting victim was balancing the coin preparatory to dropping it into the funnel, the joker would pour a glass of water into the latter, giving the newcomer a good soaking.

The gun-room is the scene of much jollity and good-humored skylarking. Midshipmen are divided into two distinct orders or classes, the junior midshipmen and the senior midshipmen. The junior midshipmen are those under the age of eighteen, or those who have been less than two years at sea. They are not allowed to smoke and are not supposed to be on shore at night. The senior midshipmen have many privileges, and as a rule try to get most of the work done by the juniors.

Strong discipline is enforced by the President of the Mess or the junior midshipmen acting under his orders. The latter are known as "Dogs of War." They will set on anyone indicated by the President, and will eject him or deal with him summarily according to orders. When the seniors are discussing politics or other subjects not supposed to be good for young ears, the President has the right of sticking a fork into the beam over his head. All the junior midshipmen then have to make themselves scarce as quickly as possible until the fork is withdrawn.

Another custom of great antiquity is the toasting of sweethearts and wives on Saturday nights by the youngest member present, who has to make a speech standing on the table.

When the juniors appear to be getting slack, they are sometimes made to perform a kind of obstacle race under the table, known as "groping." As in the rather congested conditions on board ship the underneath of the table is occupied by tin cases, trunks, and sometimes beer barrels, this is more difficult than it sounds, and is certainly a cure for sea-sickness in the case of young men who are a little unsteady on their legs in the first few days at sea.

Boat racing has always been a popular sport in the navy. One practical joke was to secure a torpedo underneath the keel of a racing boat, the starting lever being operated by means of a cord worked by the coxswain. When the torpedo was started, the boat above it would be impelled through the water at a tremendous speed, the crew doing their best to simulate hard rowing, and usually causing a great deal of excitement.

Again, I have known a sailor swim under the water or close along the side of a ship, to a boat waiting to take part in a race. He would dive under the keel and secure a canvas bucket by a short length of rope to a hole in the keel used for lashing down the tarpaulin covers. This would act as a very effective drag, and the unsuspecting crew would pull away at the oars and not understand why they made little progress.

Another trick was to remove the plug secretly from the bottom of the rival boat and replace it by a soluble plug made to look exacting like the other. After being a few minutes in the water, the soluble gum of which the temporary plug was constructed would melt, and water would begin to trickle into the boat. Often it would not be discovered for some time, when a considerable amount of water would be found lapping about in the well. In any case there would be a delay to repair damages, and this trick, if it came off, would usually have the desired effect, though it was looked upon as unsporting and reprehensible.

At Torquay, Weymouth, and other health resorts visited by portions of the fleet during the summer, ships lie close in to pleasure gardens used by young men and their sweethearts for courting at night. By Admiralty orders searchlights are supposed to be exercised once a month. On the night chosen for the monthly exercise, I have seen the searchlights suddenly switched on and concentrated on the quieter paths of these pleasure gardens with startling results for the young lovers, who did not expect this sudden intrusion on their privacy!

Life at sea is very hard, and sailors are always grumbling, which is their hereditary privilege. But they are always ready for a joke, and welcome any diversion, so long as it raises a laugh.

Elephant beetles found in West Africa often weigh, when full grown, half a pound each.

John D.'s Short of Gas.

Latest and choicest of the John D. Rockefeller jests is one of the stories of the oil king's visit to his childhood home. He had stopped his car and was taking a look at the landscape in general, when a farmer, who did not recognize him, stepped up and began to chat.

"Where are you going?" asked the son of the soil.

"I'm going to heaven," was John D.'s jocular come-back.

"Get out," he was told, "you ain't got enough gasoline."
